"In an age of radical transparency, your internal culture is your brand. Time to take action!" proclaims the headline from Trendwatching.com.

The premise is that up until recently most business operated with a black box mentality, expecting outsiders to believe whatever branding the company chose to paint on the outside of the box. "Glass box" thinking is a radical shift towards business transparency, whereby a company's internal culture and processes are on show for all to see.

Why brands need to become master storytellers

The all-revealing glass box

"Once, your internal corporate culture was just that: internal. But now that a business is a glass box, there's no such thing as an 'internal' culture." Trendwatching.com

Odgers Berndtson in sub-Saharan Africa recently shared on Bizcommunity that "Today's brands are under more scrutiny than ever before as the rise of radical transparency has catalysed an irreversible move from an inscrutable black box to an all-revealing glass box model."

The UK's University of Law states "In the current age of transparency a positive internal culture of business is vital for growth and positive public image."

How to showcase internal culture

According to Trendwatching.com in a culture-first approach, examining and improving internal culture and then telling the world via brand stories is the winning strategy to ensuring internal culture and processes become brand assets.

Global consultancy Refinerylab.com adds, “For a company used to competing in the market strictly on price or features, with little internal focus or cohesion, the idea that internal culture and processes are highly visible will be a very new one. But it will be a worthwhile process and add tremendous value if done correctly.”

“Fortune 500 companies lose roughly “$31.5 billion a year by failing to share knowledge,” Pamela Babcock SHRM.org.
