In an email to customers, Amazon explained that this move is aimed at sustaining investments in compelling content and ensuring a gradual increase in such investments over an extended period. The company also stated its intention to have significantly fewer ads compared to traditional TV and other streaming providers.

While the introduction of ads was previously disclosed in September, the specific date had not been set until now. Initially launching in the US, the UK, Germany, and Canada, other markets, including France, Italy, Spain, Mexico, and Australia, are expected to follow later in the year.

I joined Hulu in 2018 to jump into the then emerging streaming TV revolution, and what an incredible ride it has been, ultimately landing at Disney. Through all the business growth and innovation, the team is what you remember most, and I'm so proud of what was accomplished.

It's time for the next chapter, and I'm thrilled to share that I've joined Amazon to lead Prime Video Advertising. I'll be working with a talented team of customer-obsessed business builders to create something special, starting with our upcoming launch!

Amazon Prime has also confirmed that Jeremy Helfand, who advanced from a role at Hulu to oversee advertising innovation across Disney's interactive businesses, will now assume the role of vice president and head of advertising for Amazon's Prime Video.

This announcement was made by Helfand in a post on LinkedIn on Thursday.
