Inspired by her album, The Gift for Disney's retelling of the classic movie The Lion King, American artist, Beyoncé Knowles-Carter, delved deeper into the Disney film and worked with a number of international directors and artists to create a visual album filled with creativity and grandeur that was rooted in African culture.

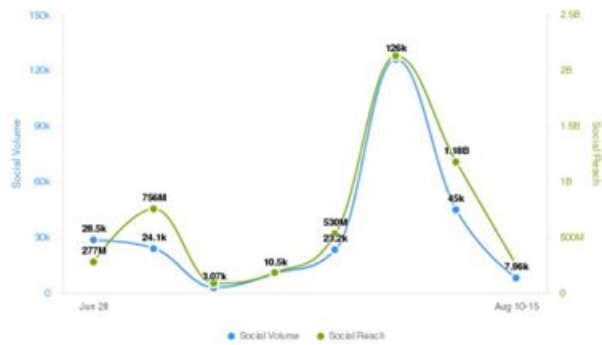

With over 370,000 global social media mentions on Black Is King between 28 June and 15 August 2020, Meltwater - the global leaders in media intelligence - tracked social media mentions on the hashtag to analyse how Beyoncé has, yet again, managed to infamously 'stop the world' with her artistry.

In the days and weeks following the release of the trailer, Black Is King has since been received positively from social media users, who have praised Beyoncé for not only collaborating with numerous African artists to create the visual spectacle, but also for the diversity and representation of a variety of African cultures portrayed in the film to tell the story of a young king.

Some social media users, however, did not share the same positive sentiments on the visual album. From mentions on how users felt the music was 'subpar' to others calling Beyoncé 'racist', these have been some of the contributions to the negative sentiment that Black Is King has received since the trailer was released.

“Let Black be synonymous with glory.”

In a similar fashion to her previous visual album, Lemonade, Beyoncé lends her voice to narrate the story of a young king throughout Black Is King, presented to audiences in a chronological way and with titles revealing the theme of each section of the film.

While there were predetermined themes for this film, trending themes from social media mentions to emerge from Black Is King included:

- ‘Black supremacy’ and ‘white butler’, which refers to these keywords mentioned in this tweet about Beyoncé getting called out on Instagram
- ‘masterful way’, which refers to online fans of the artist praising her for artistic abilities in bringing a visual film, such as Black Is King, to life
- ‘Black woman’ which refers to this tweet from a Twitter user who praised Beyoncé for writing, producing and singing in the film

While online users have called the visual album controversial in its portrayal, Black Is King has also created a global conversation about the glory of Blackness, African culture and the 'search for home'.

“ The epic journey that Beyoncé depicts in her lush visual album "Black Is King" echoes Black Americans' search for an ancestral home, Zandria F. Robinson writes. <https://t.co/J3aGVqjjdr>— The Atlantic (@TheAtlantic) August 15, 2020 ”

With a number of visually significant moments in both the trailer and the film, a moment of glory came from a number of social media users within the African continent who recognised artists from their home countries being featured in Black Is King. South Africa led online mentions on 'Black Is King' (38%), followed by Ghana and Nigeria respectively.

South Africans were especially proud to see artists such as Moonchild Sanelly, Busisiwa, Nandi Madida and Connie Chiume, while Beyoncé celebrated Ghana in the “Already” music video that played during Black Is King.

“ See it here! Epic! @shattawalegh making Ghana 🇵🇸🇵🇸🇵🇸🇵🇸 proud. Check out the #alreadyvideo with @Beyonce here <https://t.co/Fu0DjOw2qZ>— Lexis Bill (@lexisbill) July 31, 2020 ”

Once again, Beyoncé has managed to make the world stop in the wake of releasing a new visual album.

Black Is King delivered a visual spectacle that not only reimagined the story, and lessons, from Disney’s The Lion King, but took viewers on a journey rooted in a rich African history. Social media users have since responded positively to Beyoncé’s creation of a film that celebrates Black excellence and the world can only hold their breath to see what Beyoncé may create next.
